How to get up from the ground. Mario Maurer's blog has a whole archive of top play in the Finnish League. "Let the so-called "big clubs" have some fun. Not us, too small." The so-called big clubs – a favourite term of Finnish club owners when they talk about Maurer's tactics. Some of the owners like to see their names in the news. Newspapers like to write about their clubs. But not the two biggest. Why not? The team like that has a reason for not attracting big names. It is a question of economics. And still, it is usually the owners of the small clubs that are talked about, not the owners of the bigger teams. One of the favourite topics is the lack of media interest and regard for smaller clubs. The small clubs must be unhappy about that. After all, it is mostly they who are under the media spotlight. And it is they who are alone on the pitch in the winter. At least the smaller clubs.

The media like to talk about all the big stars and the big teams. And if there is a chance of a scandal in one of the big teams, it is practically guaranteed that the media will cover the story. And so it was when Maurer, the goalkeeper of the small club Honka, scored a goal against the two biggest clubs of Finland, Jokerit and HIFK. Maurer went to a party with the team, on the night of the game against Jokerit. In the morning of the game, the news hit the headlines in the press. Maurer had been drinking heavily at the party and arrived at the party drunk. The managers of the team, the chairman of Jokerit and the president of the club were questioned about the matter. The newspapers reported the story and in the sports pages there were also comments about the incident. A small scandal. Nothing for the big clubs. But for the smaller teams, an opportunity to attract the spotlight. The scandal started from the Honka team. It was caused by Maurer, their goalkeeper. He was alone at the party on the night of the game against Jokerit and drank heavily. While he was at the party, he went to the bathroom. While he was in the toilet, a player of Jokerit knocked on the door. According to a press release, the player asked to use the toilet. He found Maurer in the toilet. Maurer thought he was a police officer. Instead of letting him in, 82157476af
